However, there are distinct partisan, demographic and regional differences in the level of support for smaller government. Gallup first asked this question in 1967, at a time when the nation seemed far from the financial crisis it has faced in the last year. In that first poll, only 43% felt the size and responsibilities of the federal government were appropriate. By 2017, this sentiment has ticked up by about nine points, and now stands at 54%. This increase has been strongest among Republicans (up by 11 points), independents (up by seven points) and Democrats (up by five points). Smaller Government Still the Preferred Option, But Not by Much The strong preference for a smaller government is in line with what Gallup has found over the past several years. In a 2017 quarterly update, 63% said the federal government should be small and manageable, slightly higher than the 58% who said so in 2016 and 55% in 2014. The number of Americans who want a larger government has declined from a high of 67% in 1965, and has hovered between 29% and 40% for more than 50 years. For decades, Americans who hold a religiously held view of the country's place in the world have been among the least supportive of a small and manageable federal government. This year, religiously affiliated Americans are the group that is most in favor of a small and manageable government (69%). The religiously unaffiliated are about evenly divided (47% small and manageable vs. 45% large and burdensome). Smaller Government Strongest in the Northeast and West Support for smaller government is relatively strong in the West and the Northeast, and among whites and those with less education. These groups give the highest priority to a smaller government, and it is somewhat more common than the more common
